On and offline again: getting the best of all worlds

Adam Jenkins and José Domingo Cruz

When COVID19 struck, it threw most educators into what has been referred to as Emergency Response Teaching (ERT). This carried with it the implication that the emergency, and with it, ERT would someday end. An alternate perspective was that the inability to meet students face-to-face (F2F) in a classroom constituted Reduced/Altered Toolset Teaching (RATT). This perspective focused more on what tools remained available to the teacher and prompted teachers to enhance their toolsets to overcome the challenges posed by not being able to meet F2F. As with ERT, this was largely manifested in the adoption of various new tools, chiefly in educational technology. Two years later, the environment has changed with many educators and institutions resuming F2F classes albeit often with restrictions remaining in place for groupwork/pairwork. In this more relaxed new normal, what of the new tools that were adopted for RATT? Even with the old tools becoming available once again, there remains a place for the new tools, though to get the best from them we need to consider what pedagogical needs are best served by what is at our disposal. In this presentation, we will examine several of these tools, from the textbook to the class website and even the classroom itself, and consider the pedagogical niches where each shines. We will then consider the implications for education in terms of how to use all the tools, the old and the new, to get the best of all worlds.
