

Poems Themed Bright New Year

On January 14, the annual imperial event, Utakai Hajime no Gi, the New Year's Poetry Reading, took place in the Imperial Palace. This year's theme was Mei, meaning "Bright," and waka poems composed by the Emperor and Empress, members of the imperial family, and 10 other people, were recited in the distinctive melodies. The 10 people whose poems had been chosen as the 10 most excellent out of the 14,600 entries from the public were invited.

His Majesty's poem was a prayer for peace, gazing at Venus shining in the winter sky before dawn on New Year's Day. The Empress wrote a poem expressing her joy at conveying "congratulations" in sign language to the medalists of the swimming competition at the Tokyo Deaflympics held last November.

On the same day, the Imperial Household Agency announced the 14 second most excellent poems, which were to be read by the Emperor and Empress. Among them were two poems composed by two second-year students at Matsuyama Nishi Secondary School.

One student's poem expressed the joy and embarrassment she felt when a first-year student waved to her for the first time after she became a second-year student. The other wrote a poem about the cruelty of war using the word "tomorrow" after learning about war in class.

The two students wrote their poems in Japanese class at school. While they said, "It doesn't really feel real, but we're happy," they also expressed regret, saying, "We wish we'd been selected as one of the 10 most excellent and could have had our poems read out loud at the venue."

Highly Skilled Nepalese Playing a Big Role in Ehime

Human resources have been a target of races between businesses in Japan because of the labor shortage. This is especially true for IT professionals, who are essential for improving productivity and digital transformation.

Due to the difficulty of securing talent domestically, the Ehime prefectural government is looking overseas to support prefectural companies in recruiting foreign talent. Using prefectural programs for the fiscal year 2024, 35 Nepalese people, who acquired IT skills at top universities in Nepal, have been employed at 21 companies in Ehime. They are playing a vital role as valuable assets.

Hatada, a confectionery manufacturer in Niihama City, is one example. In this rural prefecture, especially in areas far from the prefectural capital, there were few applicants, making it extremely difficult to find talent with the desired skills.

Hatada took advantage of the prefecture's Nepalese talent matching program. Although the company must pay a maximum of 450,000 yen per hire to the prefecture's contractor, the program includes some kinds of support such as pre-employment Japanese language training and interview sessions with an interpreter. Hatada believes this program marked an unprecedented step in hiring highly skilled foreign talent.

Hatada had considered outsourcing the system that manages customers' reservation data, when a 30-year-old Nepalese joined the company last April, leading to a reduction in outsourcing costs. Now he is referred to as "extremely skilled" by other employees, Another example is Himegin Soft in Matsuyama. Himegin Soft saw an increase in requests from customers regarding artificial intelligence, but the lack of knowledgeable employees had been an issue. A 29-year-old Nepalese who joined the company in April 2023, quickly became a core member. He had worked on AI research and development at a university and graduate school in Nepal.

He is currently demonstrating his skills on multiple projects, saying "It's fun to be able to use my skills." Himegin Soft considers him a successful example of foreign talent recruitment. The company strengthened its system by hiring two more foreign professionals in 2024.

However, there is still a risk of employees leaving companies due to poaching from urban businesses. Nine of the 35 employees, who were employed at prefecture-based businesses by the fiscal year 2024, had resigned by mid-December 2025.

The president of Himegin Soft has high hopes for the three new Nepalese employees, saying that if they could not provide suitable tasks to highly capable and ambitious employees, it would lead to the loss of employees.
